

Here's a glance at the mess Musk has made:

- He helped spread misinformation about the violent attack on then-House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's husband at their San Francisco home.
- He tried — and failed — to prove that Twitter, under its previous leadership, had suppressed conservative voices and engaged in election interference with the federal government.
- He has suspended the accounts of journalists who cover the platform.
- He has helped foreign governments, including Turkey and India, censor content.
- He has overseen a spike in hate speech on the platform under the guise that he's a "free speech absolutist."
- He overturned Donald Trump's suspension from the platform, which had been imposed after the then-president used it to foment an insurrection on Jan. 6.
- He helped promote a once-banned parody account impersonating Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez, D-N.Y.
- He engaged in discussions about banning the Jewish-led Anti-Defamation League from the platform, threatened to sue the group for "trying to kill this platform by falsely accusing it & me of being anti-Semitic," and blamed the ADL for the site's loss of ad revenue.
- He has sued the Center for Countering Digital Hate, a group that monitors hate speech on social media.
- He gutted his platform's election integrity team, which devises ways to combat election-related misinformation, ahead of crucial elections around the world in 2024.

On top of all that, X appears to be burning through investors' money at a rapid pace.

It seems safe to say the platform has become a burden of some sort for nearly everyone involved with it.
